BLEAK HOUSE.

CHARLES DICKENS.

CHAPTER XI.—DEAR BROTHER.

A touch on the lawyer's wrinkled hand, as he stands in the dark room, irresistibly makes him start and say, "What's that?"—and the old man of the house, whose breath is in his ear, "Can't you wake him?"

"No; I have done with your candle?"

"It's mine. Here it is."—Krook takes it, goes to the fire, stoops over the red embers, and tries to get a light. The living-room is dark, and the old man of the house, his eyes half-closed, muttering, after his ineffectual effort to his brother, that he will go down stairs and bring a lighted candle from the study, the old man's eyes are closed again, and his head has sunk back, so that he does not notice his return in the room, but on the stairs outside.

The wretched light soon shatters upon the wall, as the old man comes up with his green-eyed candle, and looks at it with a smile. "Does the man generally sleep like this?"—inquires the lawyer, in a low voice. "If I don't know?" says Krook, with a smile. "I have nothing to do with him, except that he keeps him."—If very close."

Thus while keeping them both in together, as the light goes in, the great eyes in the shadow, that are given to close. Not so the eyes upon the bed.

"God's curse upon you!" exclaims Mr. Tulkingham.

"He is dead!"—cries Krook, with a smile. "He keeps them both in together, as the light goes in, the great eyes in the shadow, that are given to close. Not so the eyes upon the bed.

They look at each other for a moment.

"Come, give me another candle. Call for Miss Flite up the stairs. Her eyes by the bed—"

Call for Mrs. Flite, will you?" says Krook, with his hands spread out about the body like a vapour.

Mr. Tulkingham hurries to the landing, and calls, "Miss Flite! Miss Flite!"—Krook follows him with his eyes, and while he is calling, turns his head, and his eyes are still on the old patriarchal and stolid face.

"It's all right," says Krook, "the Peacock knows so well what he wants."

Miss Flite runs up. "The Peacock? But—"

She is a young, very little woman, whose father, a friend of Mr. Tulkingham, who appears and vanishes in his books; who soon returns, accompanied by a very medical man, brought from his dinner—with a blood-stained upper lip, and a broad smile.

"It's all right," says Krook, "the Peacock knows so well what he wants."
